2 Any feathered vertebrate animal : a member of the second class (Aves) of the great Vertebrate group, the species of which are most nearly allied to the Reptiles, but distinguished by their warm blood, feathers, and adaptation of the fore limbs as wings, with which most species fly in the air

Now used generically in place of the older name FOWL, which has become specialized for certain kinds of poultry, and by sportsmen for wild ducks and wild geese. In this sense, bird, ME brid, is found in the south c 1300 , it appears to have been extended from the young of birds (sense 1) at first to the smaller kinds, Chaucer's 'smale foules.' So late as a century ago, Dr Johnson says (1755–73) 'In common talk fowl is used for the larger, and bird for the smaller kind of feathered animals', and this distinction still obtains to some extent dialectally (In Scotland large birds e g hawks, herons, are 'fowls,' small birds, as well as chickens, are 'birds') A further process of specialization (cf the histories of fowl, deer, beast), seems still to be in progress in regard to bird, as witness its technical use by game-preservers (sense 3)

1 A spiritual superintendent or overseer in the Christian Church

a Used in the New Testament versions to render the Gr word ἐπίσκοπος, applied to certain officers in early Christian churches, either as a descriptive term, or as their actual title In Wyclif, the Rhemish, and Revised Versions, the Gr word is so rendered in every instance, but in the other versions from Tindale to 1611, it is in Acts xx 28 (where applied to the πρεσβύτεροι or 'elders' of Ephesus) rendered 'overseers' Also applied to Christ, as descriptive of his office (Sometimes applied by those who do not recognize the episcopal order, to their pastor or chief elder, but only as a descriptive term, or as identifying his office with that of the New Testament 'bishop')

1382 WYCLIF Acts xx 28 Al the folk in which the Hooly Gost sette 3ou bischopis [TINDALE oversears, CRANMER ouersears, Geneva Ouersears, Rhem bishops, 1611 ouerseers, 1881 bishops (marg. or overseers)] — 1 Peter II. 25 3e ben conuertid now to the sheperde and bischop of 3oure soulis [1881 the Shepherd and Bishop (marg or Overseer) of your souls] c 1383 — Sel Wks III 320 Crist veriest bischop of alle 1535 COVERDALE Phil I 1 Paul & Timotheus vnto all the sayntes with the Biszhoppes & mynisters. 1647 JER TAYLOR Lib Proph VII 130 The Holy Ghost hath made them Bishops or Over-seers.

b spec In the Eastern, Western, Anglican, and other churches of episcopal order A clergyman consecrated for the spiritual government and direction of a 'diocese,' ranking beneath an archbishop (where these exist) and above the priests or presbyters, and deacons (This is the sense in which the word passed with Christianity into all the Teutonic langs, and thus the earliest sense in English)

Blab (blæb), sb[1] Forms: 4–7 blabbe, (–blab [The history of blab and blabber, and the question of their mutual relations, if any, is very obscure Blabbe sb. 'chatterer' occurs in Chaucer c 1374, and is very common thenceforth; blab sb. 'chatter, loose talk' is in Tale of Beryn (c 1400), but has not been found elsewhere before the 16th c., when appears also blab vb 'to chatter' (1535), followed in course by its agent noun blabber But the vb blabber is earlier than any of these; it occurs in Piers Ploughman (1362), and is (with its deriv blabberer) very common in Wyclif, the facts thus forbid us to take blabber as a frequentative derivative of blab vb, while no analogy exists for the formation of either (of the only two early words) blabbe sb, blabber vb, from the other. It would be hardly justifiable to assume blabbe to be a 14th c abbreviation of blabberer. For forms akin to blabber in other langs. see that word With blabbe we have to compare a sb labbe 'revealer of secrets, blabber,' in Chaucer, and a vb labbe of same age in P Ploughman, with pple labbyng 'blabbing, open-mouthed,' also in Chaucer, identical with ODu labben to chatter 'garrire' (Stratm.) Blabbe might be a mixed form due to association of labbe and blabber, but may also be purely onomatopoeic Cf BABBLE]

In OE, found also (as the metres show) with long vowel blāce, blācan, and thus confused with blāc shining, white —OTeut blaiko-* (see BLAKE), as is shown by the fact that the latter also occurs with short vowel, blăc, blăcum; in ME the two words are often distinguishable only by the context, and sometimes not by that (Cf ¶ 7) ON blakkr is not an exact phonetic equivalent, but, if native, points to an OTeut blakko-* (for blakno see Kluge Beitr IX 162) Sievers suggests that the original Teutonic types were blĕk kno-, blakko-, subsequently levelled to blĕko-, blako-, blakko-, giving the OE. and ON words; in this case blĕk-no-* might be pa pple. of a vb blĕkan* to burn (cogn w Gr. φλέγειν), and the original sense 'burnt, scorched' Cf. BLATCH, which points to an OTeut blakkjo-*, from blakko-. In Eng black has quite displaced the original colour-word SWART, which remains in the other Teutonic languages]

Ble, obs f. BLEA sb; var BLEE, Obs, colour, etc

-ble, a OF -ble —L -bilem, nom -bilis, suffix forming verbal adjs, with the sense 'given to, tending to, like to, fit to, able to', as in sta-bili- 'like, fit to stand.' After consonant stems, -ibili-, as vend-i-bili-, vinc-i-bili-, after stems ending in a, e, i, o, u, -ābili-, -ēbili-, -ībili-, -ōbili-, -ūbili-, as honōrā-bili-, delē-bili-, sepelī-bili-, nō-bili-, volū-bili-. Some of these L words lived on into OFr, e g noble, amable, fieble, meuble; later, these became models for the extensive adoption of others from the Latin of literature. Many of both sorts were from 12th to 15th c adopted in Eng from Fr, and here served as models for the direct adoption or formation of others from Latin, a process which has gone on to the present day By far the most numerous of the -ble words are those in -able In L, -ābili- adjs arose only from verbs in -āre; but, in Fr., all pres. pples in -ant may give rise to an adj. in -able, and as -ant is now the universal form of pres pple., -able is the universal form of the adj. suffix as a living element, -ible being only a fossil survival in words from L. like horrible, possible, visible, not directly attached to a living Fr verb When the verb lives in Fr, a modern adj in -able has always taken the place of the earlier -ible form, as in vendable, croyable, préférable, for L. *vendibilis, credibilis, præferibilis But in Eng there is a prevalent feeling for retaining -ible wherever there was or might be a L. -ibilis; while -able is used for words of distinctly Fr or Eng. origin, as conceivable, movable, speakable Hence, where there is a verb in French and English, as well as in Latin, English usage is distracted by conflicting and irreconcileable analogies Thus in the compounds of -fer, L. fero, Latin analogy requires preferible, referible (Walker, Rhym Dict), sufferible; French example gives preferable, referable, Fr. and Eng analogy sufferable (cf suffering), Eng analogy (cf refer-ring) gives referrable (Bailey), conferrable, deferrable; there is also a mongrel spelling referrible, sanctioned by Dr. Johnson, but defensible on no analogy. So with the variant spellings admittable, -ible, tractable, contractible, partable, -ible. These discrepancies no mere etymological grounds can settle, though their number might be lessened by following French precedent, and extending -able to all words having a verb (with the same accent) in Eng, thus admittable, contractable, corruptable, exhaustable, vendable, etc, leaving -ible in credible, intelligible, legible, possible, etc. See -ABLE, -IBLE. The omission or retention of a final e mute before -able is also to a certain extent optional. In words directly from L. it is etymologically absent, as in excusable, declinable; in words from Eng (beside cases where it must be orthographically retained after c, g, as peaceable, changeable, chargeable, the latter also in Fr.), there is a prevalent feeling for retaining the e in monosyllables, as tameable, nameable, saleable, which otherwise would have their meaning obscured (e g tamable, namable, salable) This produces ambiguity of form in such words as blamable (F. blâmable,) blamcable, movable, moveable, lovable, loveable, sizable, sizeable, etc As much reason can be given and as much authority cited for one spelling as for the other, and until a reform of Eng spelling is made, the double form of these words must continue. In words of English formation, a final consonant is usually doubled before -able, when doubled in the pres pple., as clubbable, buddable, deferrable As to the meaning, Palsgrave (1530) says (p 302)

'Of every adjectyve partyciple . in ant may be formed an adjectyve by chaungynge of ant into able, as of muant, muable; honorant, honorable, whose signifycacion may serve bothe actyvely and passively, as muable, apte or mete or able to chaunge, or to be chaunged, honorable apte or mete or able to honour or to be honoured . In this thyng the french tonge is moche more parfyte than our tonge is, for where as they may forme of every partyciple in their tonge an adjectyve endyng in ble, in our tonge we have none suche, but must nedes use circumlocution by apte, mete, or able, and our infinityve mode, save that we have admitted as well adjectyves of the frenche tonge endyng in able and ible, as commendable, visible,' etc

As here stated, adjs. in -bili-, -ble, were originally active (and neuter) as well as passive. Many of the former exist in Eng, e.g capable, comfortable, suitable, agreeable, conformable, companionable, durable, equable; but the majority have become obsolete or remain only with a passive force, as in credible, audible, flexible, which is also the only use of -able as a living formative, e g bearable, eatable, likeable, preferable, insufferable, saleable. (For exhaustive treatment of these words see F Hall Engl Adjectives in -able, London 1877)

Bless (bles), v.[1] Forms: 1 blǽdsian, blédsian, blétsian, 2 bletsıen, bletcæn, blecen, bleccen, 2–3 bledsen, bletsen, (Orm.) blettcenn, blettsenn, 2–4 blescen, 2–5 blessen, 3 bletseiȝen, blescı, blıcen, 3–4 blıxen, blıssen, 4 blısce, blıs, blıst, 3–7 blesse, blıss(e, 5 blysch(e, blyssh(e, 5–6 blysse, 7– bless. Pa t and pple blessed, blest (arch. and poet), in 1 blédsod, blétsod, 2–3 bledsed, 2–5 bletsed, blecced, blesced, blıssed, 2– blessed, 5– blest [OE blédsıan, blédsıan, blétsıan not found elsewhere in Teutonic, but formed on the OTeut type blǽdsôjan*, f blǽdo-m* (OE blód) blood cf OE mıldsıan, miltsıan, ME. MILDE, to be mild, show pity; also, for the formation, OE rıcsian to rule = OHG rîchsôn —OTeut. rîksôjan*, f rîk-s*, Goth reiks ruler, king (An equally satisfactory derivation of blétsıan, if it were the original form, would be from blót sacrifice, on O Teut type blôtsôjan*, but besides that blédsıan actually occurs earlier, the change of ds to ts is phonetically natural, while the reverse is not) The etymological meaning was thus 'to mark (or affect in some way) with blood (or sacrifice); to consecrate'. But the sense-development of the word was greatly influenced by its having been chosen at the Eng conversion to render L benedīcere, and Gr εὐλογεῖν, which started from a primitive sense of 'speak well of or to, eulogize, praise,' but were themselves influenced by being chosen to translate Heb בָּרַךְ, primarily 'to bend,' hence 'to bend the knee, worship, praise, bless God, invoke blessings on, bless as a deity' Hence, a long and varied series of associations, heathen, Jewish, and Christian, blend in the Eng uses of bless and blessing Senses 4–6 arise mainly from benedīcere, εὐλογεῖν At a very early date the popular etymological consciousness began to associate this verb with the sb BLISS 'benignity, blitheness, joy, happiness,' which affected the use of both words (see esp senses 7, 8), and led to occasional ME. spelling of the vb. with z, y

The pa t and pple. are now generally spelt blessed, though always pronounced (blest) in modern prose; the pple. may be pronounced (ble·sed) in verse, or liturgical reading As an adj blessed (ble·sed) is now the regular prose form, but the archaic blest is frequent in verse, and traditional phrases as e g 'the Isles of the Blest']

Orig. meaning (prob.), To make 'sacred' or 'holy' with blood; to consecrate by some sacrificial rite which was held to render a thing inviolable from profane use of men and evil influence of men or demons. (The streaking of the lintel and door-posts with blood, Exod XII 23, to mark them as holy to the Lord and inviolable by the destroying angel, was apparently the kind of idea expressed by blédsıan in pre-christian times. Cf also the history of the Latin words consecrāre and sacrificium) Hence, in historical use

I To make sacred, consecrate, hallow

1. trans. To consecrate (a thing) by a religious rite, the utterance of a formula or charm, in later times by a prayer committing it to God for his patronage, defence, and prospering care, as in to bless food, to ask God's blessing on it (cf 5).

As applied to a 'snow-squall,' the word became general in the American newspapers during the severe winter of 1880–81; but according to the Milwaukee Republican 4 Mar 1881, it had been so applied in the Northern Vindicator (Esherville, Ill) between 1860 and 1870 It was apparently in colloquial use in the West much earlier; but whether Col Crockett's use of it in 1834 (sense 1) was fig, taken from the stifling blast, or was the earliest sense, and subseq transferred to the blast, is not determined]

Bloat, sb [? from BLOAT a 2 or v 2] 'A hammer swelled at the eye' Raymond Mining Gloss 1881

Bloat (blōut), a 1 Also 3–6 blote, 7 bloate [The spelling bloat occurs in this sense earlier than in that of next word, with which this is often identified, though in the present state of our knowledge it is safer to keep them distinct The ME blote is perhaps identical with ON blaut-r in the sense 'soft with moisture, soaked, wet'; or from a parallel form blōt-*. cf the ME. vb blotne, ON blotna to soften, moisten (see BLOTEN), also Sw blot soft, moist, yielding But it would also answer in form to OE blāt 'livid, pale', though this sense is less likely Sense 2 recalls ON blautr fiskr, i e. 'soft fish', applied to 'fresh' fish, but in Sw. blot fisk, to 'soaked' fish (Vigf) Though evidence of actual connexion is wanting, it is conjectured that the Eng. 'bloat herring' is, in some way, identical with these, and means, etymologically, either 'soft (moist) herring', in opposition to 'dried', or else 'soaked, steeped herring', in reference to part of the process of curing the herrings so termed. In Act 18 Chas II II 'bloated' is opposed to 'dried', and it is explained by Blount as 'half-dried', but most of the quotations give it as meaning (in actual use) 'smoked', (smoking being an important part of the process) One at least (1613 below) appears to identify it with 'puffed up', and thus with sense 2 of the next word, whereas Sylvester, in 1616, says 'Herrings shrink in bloating'; but moist herrings are naturally plumper than those more thoroughly dried See also next word, and BLOAT v 1]

Bloat (blōut), a 2 Forms. 4 bloute, 6–7 blowt(e, 7– bloat. [Apparently distinct at first (as an Eng word) from the prec, since the earlier form of that was blote, but of this blout, though of parallel origin, and, since the 17th c, identified in form, and often associated in meaning ME blout, blowt, was the regular adopted form of ON blautr- soft (as a baby's limbs, a bed, silk; see Vigf), cf Sw blot 'soft, yielding, pulpous, pulpy' The later form bloat does not answer phonetically to blout, blowt, yet its modern use is largely owing to the 'blowt king' of Hamlet having been printed 'bloat' by editors since Warburton, 1747; G Daniel had also spelt the word in this way c 1640–50. Possibly BLOAT a 1 in 'bloat herrings' (found as early as 1602) was in the 17th c a much better known word than this, and being, rightly or wrongly, identified with it, influenced its form It is to be noted that BLOAT v, and its derivatives BLOATED, BLOATING, are all of earlier use as applied to the herring, than in senses connected with this word. Sense 2 is a natural enough extension of 1; but it may have been influenced by association with blow, blown, the mutual influence of this and the prec since 1600, cannot be settled without more definite knowledge of the exact notion at first attached to 'bloat herring'] trans To cure (herrings) by a process which leaves them soft and only half-dried This is now done by leaving them in dry salt on a floor for 24 hours, washing in fresh water, spitting, and smoking them over an oak fire for a period varying from 24 hours to 3 or 4 days, according to the time they are to be kept before being eaten (Earlier authorities speak of their being steeped for a time in brine before smoking; which has to be remembered in discussing the original meaning of bloat)

Bloated herrings are opposed to dried or red herrings, which are left in dry salt for 10 days, and smoked for 14 days, whence their deep colour and shrivelled dryness.

[The origin is not quite certain; but there is good reason to think that it was at first a reference to the habits of the 'bloods' or aristocratic rowdies of the end of the 17th and beginning of the 18th c The phrase 'bloody drunk' was apparently='as drunk as a blood' (cf 'as drunk as a lord'), thence it was extended to kindred expressions, and at length to others, probably, in later times, its associations with bloodshed and murder (cf a bloody battle, a bloody butcher) have recommended it to the rough classes as a word that appeals to their imagination We may compare the prevalent craving for impressive or graphic intensives, seen in the use of jolly, awfully, terribly, devilish, deuced, damned, ripping, rattling, thumping, stunning, thundering, etc There is no ground for the notion that 'bloody', offensive as from associations it now is to ears polite, contains any profane allusion or has connexion with the oath ''s blood!']

(The etymology of blow has been naturally sought in the stem of the OTeut. vb blewwan*, Goth bliggwan to beat (which is not related to L flagĕre), in OHG bliuwan, MHG bliuwen, mod G. bläuen 'to beetle, batter, beat, drub' (whence blāuel a beetle), MDu. and mod Du blou-

wen 'to beat, thrash, drub', now esp 'to brake or swingle flax or hemp' (whence blouwel a brake for flax) The OE cognate would have been blēowan*, but of this no trace is found, and it is not easy on any theory to understand its giving rise to a substantive in the 15th c without ever appearing itself It is still less likely that an English substantive could be formed from the Du blouwen or its Ger equivalent, when there is no such substantive in these langs ('Du. blowe' in J is a figment)

Another suggestion which suits the form and accounts also for the early Sc and north English variant blaw, is that this is the same word as BLOW sb.², or at least, like it, derived from BLOW v.¹ The difficulty is, that, as to the sense, early uses of the word do not indicate any such origin, while historically, BLOW sb.¹ (in its own undoubted senses) is of later appearance The analogy of Fr *souffle*t, also, in which a word for 'a blow with the flat of the hand' arises out of the vb souffler 'to blow wind', though striking at first sight, proves on examination of the history of *souffle*t to be merely superficial)]

[ME blew, a OF bleu, a Common Romanic word (=Pr blau, blava, OSp blavo, It dial bravo, med L blāvus), ad OHG or OLG blāw-—OTeut. blēwo-z blue, whence also ON blá-, likewise adopted in ME as bla, blo, now Blae The corresponding OE form blǽw (or blēw*) is known only in Erfurt Gloss 1152, 'blata, pigmentum. haun-blauuum', and the derivative blǽwen (-blāwino-) 'perseus'. But neither of these survived into ME., where their place was supplied by the adoption of ON blá, in sense of 'lividus', and of F. bleu in sense of 'cæruleus' The OTeut blēwo- was perh cognate with L flāvus yellow (though blōwo-z would be the expected Teutonic form), the names of colours having often undergone change in their application, thus OSp blavo was 'yellowish-grey'. (The guess that blēwo- was derived from the stem bluwan*, Goth. bliggwan to beat, as 'the colour caused by a blow' is not tenable) The present spelling blue is very rare in ME, and hardly known in 16–17th c, it became common under French influence only after 1700. In pronunciation, nearly all the dictionaries still recognize (blɪ̄), but the more easily pronounced (blɪ̄) is general in educated speech]

Blue-stocking (blū stǫ·kiŋ), sb. [As an attributive phrase, with the sense of 'wearing blue stockings', this is found as early as the 17th c (see 1 a); in its transferred sense it originated in connexion with re-unions held in London about 1750, at the houses of Mrs. Montague, Mrs Vesey, and Mrs Ord, who exerted themselves to substitute for the card-playing, which then formed the chief recreation at evening parties, more intellectual modes of spending the time, including conversation on literary subjects, in which eminent men of letters often took part Many of those who attended eschewed 'full dress', one of these was Mr Benjamin Stillingfleet, who habitually wore grey or 'blue' worsted, instead of black silk stockings In reference to this, Admiral Boscawen is said (Sir W. Forbes Life of Beattie (1806) I 210 note) to have derisively dubbed the coterie 'the Blue Stocking Society' (as not constituting a dressed assembly) The ladies who supported the reform were at first called Blue Stockingers, Blue Stocking Ladies, and at length, about 1790, when the actual origin of the term was remembered by few, Blue Stockings, in later slang abbreviated to Blues]

Bluff, v[1] [Immediately related to Bluff sb.[2] 'a blinker for a horse', which, as it appears later than the verb, was presumably named from it, though the reverse is also possible The etymology is quite unknown the meaning 'blindfold, hoodwink' does not appear to have any possible connexion with Bluff a or sb[1]; the word is probably one of the numerous cant terms (see Bam, Bamboozle) which arose between the Restoration and the reign of Queen Anne Sense 2 had certainly originally the same meaning, but it looks as if recent users imagined a connexion with Bluff a or sb[1], and made it mean 'to blindfold or hoodwink by assuming a fictitious bold front']

The original form of the word is also doubtful, though blunket is both the earliest and by far the most frequent. This makes it doubtful whether it can have been an adoption of OF. blanquet, var. of blanchet, dim. of blanc white (and thus originally the same as Blanket), a derivation which would to some extent suit the sense]

Blunt (blʌnt), a and sb Also 3 Orm blunnt, 5–6 blont [Etymology unknown: found in Ormin c 1200, in a sense which has suggested some connexion with ON. blunda to doze, blunda augum to shut the eyes, blundr dozing, sleep (Vigfusson) It has been proposed to explain the form as a contracted participle, for blunded, blund, ON. blundaðr, blundat, but participles in -nt from -nd are not found so early as 1200, Ormin has none. And this would hardly give the required sense, since blunda was intransitive in ON., and the participle could hardly exist there Other suggestions are that blunt might be some kind of side-form of blind, or a nasalized deriv. of an OTeut. root blut-*, whence ON. blautr soft, weak, mod. G. bloss naked, Fris. blat, bleat naked, OE. blât wretched But in the present state of the question these are mere conjectures, having no contact with the history of the word] blush (Rare pa t in 5 blist = blyscht) [Evidently related to a series of words found in Old Norse and Low German, but not known in OHG or Gothic, pointing back to a stem *blīsz- from verbal root *blīs- in sense of 'burn, glow, be red' Cf OE *blysian in ablīsian to blush, ablysung, ablysgung 'redness of confusion, shame', with MDu blōzen, blozen (from earlier bleuzen), Du. blozen to blush, blos (formerly bleus) blush, MLG blosen, bloschen, also OE blysa wk masc, blysge wk fem, ON blys neut 'torch' (Sw bloss torch, blossa to blaze, Da blus torch, blusse to blaze, to blush), LG bluse flame, blusen to set on fire, bleusteren to inflame, glow, become red The nearest relatives of ME blusche, blosche, blysche, are app MLG bloschen, LG blusken (Brem Wb. I 105): and its antecedent form is perhaps to be found in OE blyscan, bliscan 'rutilare' (in the Aldhelm Glosses, Mone Q und F 355) but its comparatively late appearance in ME, apparently first in the north, its various vowel-forms, and the doubtful relations of the senses, esp sense 2, all combine to leave the history of the word very obscure. OE blyscan, bliscan, has also been conjectured to be for *blicsian, from root *blīk- to shine, in which case it would not be related to the blīsz- words, nor to ME blusche (The Da deponent blues to blush, may also be compared)]

[A word or agglomeration of words of complicated history, representing two originally distinct sbs, already blended in OE, and subsequently reinforced in ME by French uses of one of them, and possibly by Scandinavian uses of one or both (1) OE had bord[1] neut 'board, plank, shield, ? table', a Common Teut str neut sb, = OFris and OS bord (MDu. bort -de, Du boord 'board', bord = shelf, plate, trencher'), MHG and mod G bort 'board', Goth baurd in fotubaurd 'foot-stool', ON borð 'board, plank, table, maintenance at table' (Sw and Da bord table) —OTeut bord-o(m*, repr an Aryan bhrdhom*, Skr bṛdham* · see BRED sb (2) OE had bord[2] 'border, rim, side, ship's side', esp in phrases innan, utan bordes, also a Common Teut sb., orig str masc. but often also (by confusion with bord[1]) neuter cf OS. bord masc (? neut), MDu. bort, boort -de, Du boord masc, 'border, edge, ship's side', OHG, MHG bort masc, mod G bord masc (and neut) 'margin, border, ship-board', ON. borð neut 'margin, shore, ship-board' (Sw, Da bord 'ship-board') —OTeut bord-oz* side, border, rim (3) Relationship between these two words is uncertain. Franck suggests that bord[2] is a ppl form from vbl root ber- to raise, representing an Aryan bhrtós* 'raised, made projecting'. But the two were associated and confused at an early date · in most of the Teutonic langs., some of the senses of the masc word, in ON and perh in OE all of them, have gone over to the neuter It is certain that the sense 'side or board of a ship' belongs to bord[2], so prob did that of 'shield', the original sense being 'rim, limb, or border of the shield', the sense 'table' is doubtful (4) The WGer bord[2] masc 'border, edge, coast, side, ship's side' was adopted in Romanic, giving med L bordus, It, Sp, Pg bordo, F bord. In the ME period, and subsequently, the French use of the word has in return greatly influenced the Eng, so that certain modern uses and phrases of board are really from French It is also possible that the development in ME was in some points (see branch II) due to Scandinavian uses]

14. On board (beside the technical sense in 12 c) has now, in common use, the meaning: On or in a ship, boat, etc, into or on to a ship. That this expression is elliptical, is witnessed by the fuller form on ship-board (cf. ME 'within schippe burdez' in 12), and the construction 'on board of the ship', or 'on board the ship' (where it is perhaps often supposed that 'board' means the deck).

On board appears to be a later expansion (cf a-foot, on foot) of Aboard, a-bord, and this to have been taken directly from Fr. à bord, as in aller on monter à bord, être à bord, short for au bord du vaisseau, in which bord 'ship's side' comes contextually to be equal to 'ship' itself. Similar phrases are used in other modern Teut langs, as Du aan boord, Ger. an bord, Sw, Da. om skibsbord. Although on borde occurs poetically in OE., and vpon borde in ME, in sense of 'in, upon ship', these appear to have no historical connexion with the later a-board, which begins about 1500, and on board, which appears late in the 17th c.

Boat (bōut) Forms. 1–3 bát, 4 bot, 4–5 boot, (4–6 boote), 4–7 bote, 6–7 boate, (6 botte, boitt, 7 Sc pl bottes), 6– boat, north 4–6 bate, 5–6 bait, bayt, (5 pl bat(t)is). [OE bát: the subsequent phonetic history in Eng is perfectly normal, but the origin of the OE word, and its relation to forms in other languages presents difficulties

OE bát (unless onomatopœic) must have been either the regular representative of an OTeut baito-, (-u-*), or an adoption of a word bát from some other language (1) The chief relevant fact in Teutonic is that ON had also bát-r in the sense 'small boat', whence regularly Sw. båt, Da baad 'boat' But the OE and ON words were not cognate, since the ON form corresponding to OE bát would have been beit-r*, while the OE form corresp to ON bát-r (=OTeut báito-) would have been bát, bât*, giving mod Eng beet* In one of the two langs, therefore, bát- must have been adopted from the other the accessible evidence is on the whole in favour of its priority in OE This is further favoured by the actual occurrence in ON of a neuter sb beit 'boat' (Hávamál st 90, etc), which, exc. in gender, is the required form corresponding to OE bát, from OTeut baito-* It is therefore highly probable that the OE bát is original, and báttr an ON adoption of it (2) In any case the absence of the word from continental West Germanic is remarkable here an OTeut baito-* would have given OS bât, Du beet, OHG beiz, Ger beiss, an OTeut báito-* would have given OS bât, Du baat, OHG bâz, mod G bass No such forms exist, on the contrary, mod Du, LG and mod G have actually boot of these the Ger word is a recent adoption from LG or Du boot, found in early MDu c 1250, the ō of which can be accounted for only by its adoption from early ME, or from Scand., at a date when the á of these langs. had already become (ō) (3) A stem bât- or batt- must have had an early diffusion in Romanic: cf F. bateau, OF batel, Pr bateih, Cat batell, Sp batel, It batello (Florio), now battello, diminutives from a primitive bâto*, batto (the latter actually used in It in sense of 'small sea-vessel'), OF bat 'small boat' found in 12th c, med L had also bâtus, battus, the former app only in English documents, the latter (as well as batellus) continental But no etymology of these is found in Romanic, on the contrary Diez can only refer them back to OE bât, this is extremely improbable; and the difficulties are only a little lessened by substituting ON. bátr as the presumed source Moreover this derivation requires bâtus* as the original type, while the form really indicated by OF, med.L, and It is battus* Unless the latter could be a neben-form of bâtus (cf. It tutto, beside L tôtus, Sp todo etc), it could hardly have any etymological connexion with English-Norse bát- A Celtic source has been frequently attributed to both the OE and Romanic words, but Celtic scholars now know that the cited OWelsh bat, Welsh bad, is merely an adoption of the OE word (4) Franck points out that, in MDu, boot fem. meant 'cask', as in mod Sc meal-boat = 'cask, barrel, tub', prob identical with F botte, Pr. and Sp. bota, It botte, med Lat bota, butta, Butt, and suggests that this may bear at least upon the Du and LG boot it is true that words of general sense like 'vessel', vaisseau, and specific words like 'tub', have been applied to ships and boats, but besides that no vestige of any such sense as 'cask, tub', etc appears either in ON or OE bát, these last could in no way be connected in form with bota, botta, or butta (5) The conclusions at present tenable are, therefore, that apparently there was an OTeut baito-* preserved only in ON beit and OE bat, that the latter was also adopted in ON as bát-r, and that either from Eng or Norse the word was adopted in Low Ger and Dutch, as bât, boot But that the Romanic batto, láito, and its family, arose out of the English-Norse word is very doubtful]

Bocardo, bokardo ⋆ (bǫkā ɹdǫ) [In med L. the logical term goes back to the 12th or 13th c. On the question of its relation to senses 2, 3, there appears to be no evidence · the conjecture has been offered that the prison may have been named in jocular reference to the impossibility of directly reducing this mood to the First Figure, or because it was considered an awkward form of the syllogism to get out of. The mutual relation of senses 2 and 3 is also uncertain. so far as the evidence goes, 2 may be a specific use of 3, or 3 a generalized application of 2. If the prison was named from the scholastic term, there would be an appropriateness in the name being first given in Oxford.]

1 Logic A mnemonic word, representing by its vowels the fifth mood of the third figure of syllogisms, in which the premisses are a particular negative and a universal affirmative, and the conclusion a particular negative, the middle term being the subject of both premisses · thus some M is not P, all M is S, some S is not P.

(In default of finding it elsewhere, the derivation has been sought in Celtic The Welsh bidog gyn 'little dagger', fixed on by some, must be discarded, both because it is accented on the penult, and because the ME word was itself adopted on the penult, and because the ME word was itself adopted in Welsh as bwythin, but some still think it possible that boydekin may have originated in some kind of corruption of Ir bideog, Gael biodag, Welsh bidog dagger)]

Bogus (bō·u gəs), (sb[1]) a [A cant word of U S., about the origin of which many guesses have been made, and ‘bogus’ derivations circumstantially given

Dr S Willard, of Chicago, in a letter to the editor of this Dictionary, quotes from the Painesville (Ohio) Telegraph of July 6 and Nov 2, 1827, the word bogus as a sb applied to an apparatus for coining false money Mr Eber D. Howe, who was then editor of that paper, describes in his Autobiography (1878) the discovery of such a piece of mechanism in the hands of a gang of coiners at Painesville, in May 1827, it was a mysterious looking object, and some one in the crowd styled it a ‘bogus’, a designation adopted in the succeeding numbers of the paper. Dr Willard considers this to have been short for tantrabogus, a word familiar to him from his childhood, and which in his father's time was commonly applied in Vermont to any ill-looking object, he points out that tantarabobs is given in Halliwell as a Devonshire word for the devil Bogus seems thus to be related to Bogy, etc]
